Many students in Taiwan are stressed and overwhelmed by the amount of homework given to them every day. Teachers should assign less to no homework to students. With this students have the freedom to do what they want like playing basketball or learn something that interests them. They have less pressure to finish homework on time and they can spend more time with their family.

Students can have more free time if their homework is lesser than now, and they can do something that interests them, such as playing a sport like basketball or badminton. They can also learn something they like such as playing the piano, violin, and so on.

Students will have less pressure to finish homework on time if they have less homework. Some students don't have to work till midnight to finish their homework. They can spend more time with family.

Doing homework makes students learn better, but doing too much homework results in counter-productivity. Appropriate amount of homework can make students happily learn things and can make teachers happy as well.
