

Education Values in TV Programs

Now a day, there are many different kinds of TV programs on TV. It has been said that television has little real educational value. There are few reasons that I disagree with this statement.

First, watching news programs are a great reason and example of why television has real educational value. We can know what is happening around the world and in my neighborhood. There was a big news that happened a few months ago, which was the presidential election in the United States. It showed me how people in America vote in an election. Besides being aware of the things that are happening around world, news programs also tells us how to prepare for school assignments. For example, we have a school competition called “Top Anchor”. It is a competition that lets students be a new anchor. Watching the news helps students improve in this competition.

Second, there is also another good educational program called the Discovery Channel. It tells us how to survive in the wild. Maybe we’ll need those skills when we are trapped in the wild. In addition, it shows science and geography with visual videos and information. It helps us a lot in school. For example, in elementary school we have a subject called science and whenever a teacher begins a new unit, he would always play a video from the Discovery Channel. This helps me know what the teacher is talking about in class.

News programs and the Discovery Channel give us a lot of information and open our minds. These programs and channels prove that television has real educational value.
